New York attorney James B. Donovan was slated to fly to Havana from Miami late today to complete negotiations for release of more than 1,100 Cuban Bay of Pigs invasion prisoners.

Donovan, who arrived in Miami last night, planned to leave on Pan American's 11 a.m. flight, but the departure was delayed.

It was reported that the delay was caused by a late return of the airline's morning flight from the Cuban capital. The delay in Havana was caused by the departure of President Osvaldo Dorticos and Foreign Minister Raul Roa for New York, where they will attend the United Nations General Assembly.

The airliner flying Dorticos to New York turned back for Havana, police said at Idlewild Airport.

Reason for the reversal was not known.

BURSITIS ATTACK

Since Donovan's arrival here last night his activities and whereabouts were cloaked in secrecy.

Spokesmen for the Cuban Families Committee for Liberation of the Prisoners, for whom Donovan is contributing his services, reported they had not heard from him here.

The News learned, however, that Donovan originally had planned to fly to Cuba last Sunday, but was forced to postpone the trip for at least 48 hours because of an attack of bursitis.

In the speech at Philadelphia Saturday, Donovan said he was hopeful that the prisoners would be freed within two weeks in exchange for a multimillion-dollar package of foods and medicine.
